SUPPLEMENTAL to PSYCHOLOGICAL EXPERT REPORT

In the matter of B.B. v S. Bradley Mell, et al. DOCKET NO. ESX-L7200-19

INTRODUCTION

I performed an independent forensic psychological evaluation of Lilly Cannon in 2021 and 2022 to determine the psychological impact of Ms. Cannon's exposure to childhood sexual abuse and rape by Bradley Mell. I issued an Expert Psychological Report on March 1, 2023 (the "Expert Report"), detailing my findings, conclusions, and expert opinions.

I recently conducted a follow-up evaluation with Ms. Cannon on October 13, 2025, for a little over two hours to assess for any changes in her mental status and psychological functioning since my last evaluation of her. She was given follow-up measures of the Beck Depression Inventory-II (BDI-II), Beck Anxiety Inventory (BAI), and the Posttraumatic Stress Disorder Checklist for DSM-5 (PCL-5).

Additionally, I reviewed depositions that had not yet been conducted when I issued my expert report, including those of Lilly Cannon, Bradley Mell, Laura Cannon, and Ella Cannon. I also reviewed Ms. Cannon's updated medical records.

After this follow-up analysis, my professional opinions outlined in my Expert Report remain unchanged.

FINDINGS

Based on this updated evaluation, Ms. Cannon continues to be significantly impacted by the sexual abuse, rapes, stalking, and threats from Bradley Mell, and remains negatively affected by his release from prison and his actions during this ongoing lawsuit. Although she has made progress in important areas of her life, such as graduating from college and finding meaningful work, the trauma from the abuse, grooming, psychological manipulation, and stalking still causes her ongoing psychological and emotional suffering. Additionally, she feels distressed and triggered by Mell's release from jail, worries about what he might do, and is disturbed by her perception of Mell's lies, obfuscation, and refusal to take responsibility for his actions, as shown by his behavior in this lawsuit.

Ms. Cannon still meets DSM-5 criteria for Posttraumatic Stress Disorder due to childhood sexual abuse inflicted by Bradley Mell. She continues to show symptoms across all four PTSD clusters with varying intensity and frequency, such as experiencing intrusive reminders of the abuse, attempting to avoid reminders and feelings related to the abuse, having negative changes in cognition and mood linked to the abuse, and experiencing hyperarousal and reactivity.

Ms. Cannon continues to face high levels of anxiety every day. When thoughts of Mell and what he did to her (and what he is still doing) come into her mind, she experiences intense physical symptoms like a rapid heartbeat, clammy hands, shortness of breath, and stomach upset. She has trouble sleeping and has nightmares at times. She also shows signs of depression, mainly through irritability and anger. She feels a deep sadness that she is still having to deal with the effects of Mell's abuse and sometimes blames herself, feeling "disappointed that it still consumes my life." She works hard to move forward and cope, but the trauma and abuse still cause her emotional distress. Since Mell's release from prison, her fear of him has increased, and she experiences hypervigilance and remains highly alert and watchful for any signs of him.

Notably, Ms. Cannon experiences significant distress regarding her sense of self, autonomy, purpose, and independence. She has been dealing with this trauma and abuse for the last nine years – a critical period of development from adolescence into young adulthood—since she was 15 years old. She does not remember what it feels like not to be grappling with this trauma. She contemplates and ruminates on what her life would be like if Mell hadn't abused her. Would she still be interested in law? Would her family life have been different? Would her intimate relationships be more meaningful? This trauma questioning leads to depressive and anxious symptomatology. These are the very real and long-reaching psychological and developmental injuries that result from childhood sexual victimization and exploitation by a trusted, known adult.
